SOME HINTS TO FARMERS.

West Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station Notes-Combating Insects.

The season of the year has arrived when the thoughtful and progressive farmer should give attention to some of the details necessary for the protection of his crops and stock from the rayages of insect pests. The time has arrived when the cadling moth will enter upon its period of activity, and deposit the eggs which will make the wormy ap-ples, and largely reduce the yield if it be not vigorously combated. The circulios, also, will begin to deposit their eggs in the young fruit almost as soon an it begins to assume shape. By spending a little time and attention in spraying the orchards and fruit trees at this season of the year, with an occasional treatment later, much of the damage done by these pests can be averted. It is evident that insect pests in the state are upon the increase, and every man engaged in fruit culture, or interested in it, should take vigorous interested in it, should take vigorous steps to reduce their number and to check their damages before it becomes too late. The best time to fight this enemy is this season of the year, and we commend to the farmers the judicious use of the various solutions applied by spraying, as described in bulletin 21 of the West Virginia Agricultyral Experiment Station.

Many of the farmers in pruning their orchards are in the healt of leaving the

Many of the larmers in pruning their orchards are in the habit of leaving the branches either lying in piles or scattered around in the orchard, where they become the breeding places of insects, which are liable later to attack the sound trees in the orchard and provo destructive. Whenever a fruit tree or its branches are dead or dying it should be removed at the branches. should be removed or the branches cut off, and these, together with all the limbs removed by pruning, should be burned as soon as possible. A few hours' work spent in cleaning up the or-chard of this kind of trash every spring may preserve it from serious and irrep-arable damage later. THE USE OF COMMERCIAL PERTILIZERS.

The commercial fertilizer represents one of the highest applications of science to practical farming. The expert skill of the chemist is employed to concentrate as much plant food into as small a bulk as possible, so that the commercial fertilizer represents as strongly concentrated plant food as the progress of modern science will permit. This being the case the farmer should remember that it is dangerous to apply these strong fertilizers with the seed, or too close to the young plant. A moment's thought the young plant. A moment's thought will convince the farmer that the average corn or potato plant spreads it roots over quite a large area and he can safely estimate that the roots will extend over a larger area than the top of the plant, so that a fertilizer applied anywhere in the impelliate yieinty of a plant is likely to fertilizer applied anywhere in the immediate vicinity of a plant is likely to be utilized by it. The farmer, also, should acquaint himself with the root habits, if we may use the expression, of a plant so that the fertilizer will always be placed in the soil above rather than below the roots of the plant. Take, for example, the corn plant. The roots of this plant do not run down, but spread themselves out horizontally over a large surface at a depth rarely exceeding six inches, so that the fertilizer to become available to the plant should not be available to the plant should not be placed below two inches from the sur-placed below two inches from the surface, and in many soils, it would be much better upon the surface than placed at a depth of six inches.

Our fertilizer manufacturers have led the farmers to believe that great things are to be hoped for from particular brands of fertilizers, and the farmers are induced to buy the "seed maker," the "root grower," the "grass producer," etc., under the idea that there is extraordinary potency in a particular brand for a particular purpose. This may, for a particular purpose. This may, and may not, be true. What the farmer should do is to pay no attention to the name or brand of a fertilizer, but give his attention to the kind and quantity of plant food contained in the fertilizer. or plant food contained in the tertilizer. For example, it is very largely a wastage of money to apply a nitrogenous fertilizer to potatees and corn, as the nitrogen is not utilized by these plants in such a manner that they will ordinarily more required. prove remunerative for an expenditure in this element of plant food. The same in this element of plant food. The same is true in a very large measure of fruit trees and berry vines, tomatoes, cabbage and a number of other plants. On the other hand, nitrogen applied to wheat, oats, rye or grass, or generally to forage crops, excepting clover, will aimost always prove remunerative. If a few of the dollars, clover, will almost always prove remunerative. If a few of the dollars, spent in buying fertilizers that are applied without any knowledge of the principles of fertilization, and therefore frequently very largely wasted, were invested by the farmer in books like Storer's "Agriculture," and Ville's "Artificial Manners," and diligently studied, or expended in the subscriptions to good, live agricultural papers, it would prove of great advantage to our agricultural interests. Frequently, the application of a single fertilizer like potash to potatoes or cabbages will prove more remunerative than three times the amount in applying complicated fertilizers with high-sounding titles. Vendvise all farmers to use fertilizers judiciously, and in buying fertilizers, buy plant food rather than particular brands of fertilizers.

Patti's Wonderful Castle.

The house in which Patti lives is one of the most interesting of homes. "Craig-y-Nos Castle," as the songstress has christened it, is hidden away in the wild hills of the Swansea valley of Wales, writes Florence Wilson in her charming account of "A Day in Patti's Castle," in the May Ladies' Home Journal. It would be one of the most inaccessible spots imaginable were it not for a little railway which runs within four miles of it. In pleasant weather it would be difficult to find a prettier bit of landscape, but in wet and wintry weather, when storms sweep through the valley and transform the tumbling little Tgwy river into a foaming torrent, it is a good place to keep Pattl's Wonderful Castle.

tumbling little Tgwy river into a foaming torrent, it is a good place to keep away from. Patti's reason for choosing a home there was a good one. The peculiarly moist air of the place suited her voice better than any other locality she could find on the English side of Dover straits. Having once determined where she would live, Patti began to build a home consistent with her ample ideas of comfort and luxury. The most remarkable thing about "Craig-y-Nos" is that such an establishment is to be found in such a remote part of the country. It is very much as though Jay Gould had built his Irvington palace in the heart of the Adirondecks, instead of on the slope of the Hudson river. In point of architectural beauty or extent of acreage it would be absurd to compare "Craig-y-Nos" with any of the great ancestral estates of the English aristocracy. The castle takes its lish aristocracy. The castle takes its name from a huge, ill-shaped hill called "Craig-of-the-Night," To get around this hill and make her house moderately accessible from the railway station, Patti spent $20,000 in building a road-
